To whom it may concern,

I became aware of Ratio Christi in September 2011, and was impressed with what was happening. This relatively new organization has all the signs of becoming a mass movement. They have grown by over 500 percent in less than a year, and have already gained the support of many well-established organizations. I think they are a worthy candidate for consideration of your financial support.

By opening student apologetics clubs officially recognized by universities, they are actively employing trained apologetics in what has become a national grassroots campaign. They are not only becoming a recruiting tool for seminaries, they are also becoming a source of ministry opportunities for many apologetics/worldview ministries in the country. One of the things I am most impressed with is how their growth is directly tied to their philosophy of becoming a "servant of all" as Christ told his disciples to do in Matthew 20:26.

They have become an effective ministry by building a grassroots organization in the apologetics/worldview movement focused on serving others at the local level. Since they are not under the umbrella of any seminary or other apologetics/worldview ministry, they are able to gain the cooperation of other like-minded organizations. In my view, they are a vital and strategic element for equipping university students and churches for renewed evangelism and cultural engagement.

I hope you will carefully consider supporting Ratio Christi.

Sincerely,

Charles W. Colson
